TABLEAU'S JULIUS VÆRNÆS TRANSFORMS BLIND DRAWINGS INTO SCULPTURAL VASES FOR NORMANN COPENHAGEN

Copenhagen-based creative studio TABLEAU, led by designer Julius Værnæs, has collaborated with Normann Copenhagen to create the Draw Vase – a sculptural resin vase series that translates intuitive blind drawings into three-dimensional form.

The Draw Vase collection consists of two sizes, each derived from a unique blind drawing by Julius. Created through a process of drawing without looking, these sketches capture immediate emotional imprints, which are then extruded into tactile, translucent resin forms. The result is a series of vases that balance spontaneity with architectural presence. The materiality of the design enhances this dialogue: its transparent and reflective surface interacts with light, emphasizing the contours of the drawing and creating a compelling spatial presence.

Founder of the multidisciplinary design studio TABLEAU, Julius, explains: “The botanical world is the core of my practice. Flowers have always been a medium to create emotion and atmosphere.” At the center of his work is an intuitive design methodology. For more than a decade, he has developed blind drawings, often depicting flowers, as a way of capturing immediate and honest expression. While the process of drawing flowers is instinctive and almost naïve, the outcome is deliberate and sculptural.

This approach is central to the Draw Vase. Developed from Julius’ drawings and shaped into transparent, reflective resin, the design transforms a spontaneous, intuitive line into a structured object. Designed to hold a single stem, the vase reflects Værnæs’ belief that an object does not need to be complex to be meaningful. “There is a lack of vases for single stems with a strong, expressive character,” he adds. “For me, it has been difficult to find objects in that category. The Draw Vase responds to that need – something simple, but with a lot of character.”
